Almost every one appreciates the duty of governing the tongue, although few people dwell upon the necessity of controlling the thoughts. Right speaking is too often classed among the impossibili-

The excuse is a generally accepted one, but it has not sufficient foundation in fact. Isolated thoughts cannot always be controlled. They flash into the mind Eke obstinate sprites, and the more one fixes the attention upon them in disapproval the more impossible does it become to expel them.

thoughts. When a malicious or frivolous member of the tribe starts into being they can be best combated, not by out and out fighting, but by turning in-stantly to another class of valuable and nteresting reflection.

The mind may be so thoroughly disciplined that its thoughts shall be drilled battalions of soldiers. They will doubtless be always raw troops, not marching according to strict military rule, and not m all cases sure to obey upon the moment, but they will steadily improve with practice, conforming themselves more and more to the true and the good.

Physiologists have a great deal to say about the force of habit. Dispose the brain toward a certain line of thought and it will keep it with increasing steads ness, for purely physical reasons. It has its automatic action, as the fingers have theirs, when they so accustom themselves to seeking the keys of the piano that they find them without the aid of

The discipline of the thoughts contributes to the intellectual as well as moral development. There are in all lives unoccupied intervals of time, when one is riding to and from his place of business, or taking his "constitutional." for example. He cannot read or study to advantage at such moments, but instead of letting the mind drift whither it will, he can fix it upon the last poem he has read or upon some truth from an author of value.—Youth's Companion

The Persian antelope seems to be a duplicate of his distinguished American relative in a general all round sense: he is, if anything, even more nimble footed than the spring heeled habitue of the west, possesses the same characteristic jerky jump, and hoists the same conspicuous white signal of retreat. He is a decidedly slimmer built quadruped, how-ever, than the American antelope; the body is of the same square build, but is sadly lacking in plummess, and he seems to be an altogether lankier and less well flavored animal. For this constitutional difference he is probably indebted to the barren and inhospitable character of the country over which he roams, as compared with the splendid feeding grounds of the far west. The Persians sometimes hunt the antelope on horseback, with falcons and greyhounds; the falcons are taught to fly in advance and attack the flecing antelope about the head, and so confuse them and retard their progress in the interest of the pursuing bounds and horsemen.—Outing.

"The Queen's Pipe." In the center of the tobacco warenouses at the London docks there is an immense kiln, which is kept continually burning, day and night, and goes by the name of the queen's tobacco pipe. The English government has a different way of treating confiscated articles than that in use in this country, one of them being to utilize them as fuel for what is termed the queen's smoking. Whenever merchandise is seized for nonpayment of duty, or because it is considered under the law as in a damaged or unsalable condition, it is taken to this great kiln and burned there, the owners having no remedy. The only utilization that is made of these scizures is from the sale of the ashes from the furnace, which, to the amount of a great many tons a month, are sold by auction to chemical works, and to farmers and others to be used in enriching the soil. There is a similar but smaller queen's tobacco pipe in the government tobacco warehouses at Liverpool, these two forming the points of destruction for all confiscated merchandise in the United Kingdom.—

Cincinnati Commercial Gazette Dickens as an Actor. Carlyle referred to Dickens as an actor. having seen him in one of his amateur performances. He gave it as his opinion that Dickens' genius was essentially his-trionic and mimetic; that with his faculty of keen and minute observation, his general alertness of mind and body, his mobile power of gesture and expression. he had all the requisites of a successful actor, and that had he lived at a great period of the drama, in the Elizabethan age for instance, his genius would have found its appropriate outlet on the stage. He would have become a popular comic actor, writing a humorous piece now and then, perhaps, as was the custom of such actors in those days. But while hving under different conditions and working with his pen, his books still retained and revealed the native genius of their author. They had the sustained, if rather jerky, liveliness, the pleasant tricks and mannerisms of humorous portraiture upon the stage. He was, short, a born actor.—The Athenseum.

A Derbyshire Story. A correspondent calls to mind that in Derbyshire a story was told about fifty years ago which has some resemblance to the story of Tam o' Shanter, as related or adapted by Burns. Upon a dark evening, as a man was riding homeward, he passed a large house which was all ablaze with light. From within came a sound of music and dancing. The house, he knew, was said to be haunted, and, being curious to see what was going on, he went in at the door. He was invited by the revelers, who appeared to be ordinary men and women, to supper. According ly he sat down at the supper table, but before he began to eat he asked his host to say grace. The guests said, "Hush!" but the host did not say grace. Then the stranger shut his eyes and said grace himself devoutly. When he opened them all was still, the inmates had gone and he was left in utter tarkness.-Notes and Saved by Oll. A wreck on Sable Island deserves attention because of its bearing upon a problem now deeply interesting seafarers the world over. It tappened in 1846, and Superintendent Darby is our authority. A wild gale had suddenly sprung up, and he and his men were patrolling the beach, when they descried a large schooner running right down before the storm dead on to the lee shore.

the sea was breaking everywhere as far as the eve could reach, and it seemed impossible for any vessel to live in it for a moment; yet on the schooner came, passing breaker after breaker uninjured, the extraordinary thing being that, although the huge waves raised their curled heads almost to the top of her masts, and the fall of any of them upon her deck would have crushed her like an egg shell, a recognized duty, but right thinking is not one seemed permitted to touch her. On the contrary, as if by a miracle, the sea became smooth ere it reached her, "It may be wicked to feel so, but I and she left a shining track behind. After some minutes of thrilling suspense, she was hurled high and dry upon the beach, and every one of her crew rescued uninjured.

Then came the explanation of the strange phenomenon which had so mys-tified Superintendent Darby. Two large casks filled with fish oil had been lashed in the fore rigging, and, securely lashed beside them, two of the strongest sailers It is, however, within the limits of hu- in the crew, with long wooden ladles in man effort to control the tendency of the | hand, had been throwing the oil high up in the air, where it was caught by the wind and carried far to leeward in advance of the vessel, spreading over the sea with such effect that, while it was raging, pitching and treaking all about her, not a barrel of water fell upon the Arno's deck. I believe this may with safety be claimed as one of the earliest recorded instances of the practical application of oil to the troubled waters.—Scribner's Maga-

The Man Who Laughs.

"I remember," said an old physician of Baltimore, lately, "that I traveled in 1838 in a stage coach across the Alleghany mountains from Cumberland to the Ohio river. In the coach were two friends, young men and lawyers, who were going out to settle in western Pennsylvania.

"We became well acquainted in the long, leisurely journey. Both of my fellow travelers were men of ability and calture; both had good breeding and kindly disposition. But their temperaments were widely different.

"C — never joked, and rarely smiled.

If a laughable story was told he listened silently, thought over it an hour, and then began to argue against its probability. If the morning was cloudy he was sure of a storm before night; if the harness broke he was positive we would be detained all day: if the coachman drove fast he knew the man was drunk, and that our necks would be broken.

"M-, on the contrary, was a merry light hearted fellow, full of anecdote and quick repartee. The weather was always delightful for him, the meals delicious, his companions the finest company in the world. He saw every point in the landscape, every fine outline in the trees or tint in the fields. He was like a bee, gathering a drop of honey here, another there. His comrade never knew that there was honey to gather. When they left us, I said, 'There goes one man to success, the other to defeat." "I visited lately the city in which they settled, and asked their lustory, being anxious to know whether my prophecy had been correct. M---- is still living, a leading jurist, a man of great and benignant influence. C--- was dead. 'Worried bunself into the grave,' said an man who remembered him."-Youth's Companion.

and The Deutsche Hausfranen Zeitung tells the following story of its origin: A poor monk, who had been condemned to death, was told that his sentence would whole of the code in a single right. lying on the impossibility of the task, his judges furnished him with the original, pen and ink, and left him in his well barred prison. A drowning man catches at a straw to save himself, and the unfortunate monk began to try his last impossible task with the vain hope of accomplishing it. Before long, however, he saw that he could not save his life by his own weak exertions. Afraid of a cruel and certain death, and perhaps doubting the promise of a better life hereafter, he invoked the aid of the prince of darkness, promising to surrender his soul if he were assisted in his task. The dark spirit appeared as soon as he was called, concluded the contract, sat down like any copying clerk, and the next morning the devil's code was finished. - Boston
